As she opened the car door, a Detroit News photographer George Clark, who was standing off the car door, knocked over the car door and ran over George Clark. The Detroit police and paramedics from the hospital responded. The driver, a student at Copin College, was taken to the hospital for treatment. The police department called the hospital and asked the hospital to send a doctor to the scene to check the information and prepare for some situations.

According to Eubanks, this was not her normal routine. She was not making any effort to get her friend to drive other people. She was not trying to get the police to come.

But the night was far from over. Once Metropolitan police had arrived almost 20 minutes after the vehicle had left. Jordan was able to return to her dorm.

After 23 years of service to Howard in the English, English, and African studies departments, Clark described his departure as a hostile farewell to the part of administrators. She is just one of the hundreds of employees who have left Howard in the past few months.

Clark is an experienced Howard employee and father of three.

School of Divinity celebrates 125th convocation

By Josey T. Dumas

Hilltop Staff Writer

When Howard University received its charter from President James Madison in 1867, the School of Divinity was one of the university's original departments. Today, the School of Divinity celebrates its 125th anniversary with a special convocation. The School of Divinity has been a significant part of Howard University's history and has played a critical role in the development of Afro-American ministry and leadership.

The convocation was held on November 8, 2018, with a banquet and keynote address by Dr. Elizabeth A. Bounds, President of Howard University. The event was attended by faculty, staff, alumni, and members of the Howard University community. The convocation also featured a special address by the Rev. Dr. Jonathan Butler, President of the National Association of Christian Churches.

The School of Divinity has a long-standing tradition of excellence in the preparation of religious leaders. The School's mission is to educate and equip leaders for ministry, with a focus on the needs of the African-American community and the world. The School of Divinity celebrates its 125th anniversary with a sense of pride and a commitment to continue its tradition of excellence.

The convocation was a memorable event that brought together members of the Howard University community to celebrate the School of Divinity's rich history and to look forward to the future.

Freshmen fight financial aid cuts, write letters to congressmen

By Steven G. Hilltop Staff Writer

Freshmen at Howard University are fighting budget cuts to the financial aid program. The freshmen have written letters to their congressional representatives and have planned a protest to demand a fair financial aid package for all students.

The protest is scheduled for November 10, 2018, and will be held on the steps of the Howard University Administration Building. The freshmen hope that their protest will bring attention to the importance of financial aid and the need for a fair financial aid package for all students.

Republican legislators seek reform of immigration

By Cathleen Harrington

Hiring start frills

Republican lawmakers won't be able to change illegal and legal immigration. Representative Lamar Smith (R-Tex) introduced a bill to reform immigration in the National Interest. Smith has been a critic of immigration and Clinton's policies. He has sought to increase immigration levels through a legislative process. This legislation will not affect Critics of the bill say it is a "little door" for illegal immigration. Representatives are concerned about the bill's impact on the nation's security. Smith said his bill will not increase illegal immigration. Critics argue that the bill will lead to increased illegal immigration.

Elections promote democracy in South Africa

By Ndileka Mokolohle

May say that the recent local government elections in South Africa were a victory of democracy.
They won by a margin of 45.5% to 43.5%, with the rest of the votes going to the Democratic Alliance, the Congress of South African Trade Unions and the African National Congress.

The elections were held at district council meetings in different provinces across the country. The results were announced on Thursday, and showed that the ANC had won 87 of the 90 districts.

The ANC had been expected to win, but the results were still considered a surprise. The DA had been expected to do well in the capital, Pretoria, and in the Western Cape province, but surprisingly it lost in both areas.

ANC leader Jacob Zuma said the election results were a victory for the party and a step forward for democracy in South Africa.

Zuma said: "We are pleased with the results of the election, which show that the people of South Africa have voted for democracy and for change."

ANC supporters celebrated outside their party's offices in Pretoria and Cape Town.

The DA, which had hoped to win the election, was disappointed with the results.

Its leader, Brian H�tter, said:
"We accept the results of the election, but we are disappointed that we did not win.

We will now continue to work for a better South Africa, and we will not give up the fight."

The election results were welcomed by international observers, who said they had seen a free and fair election.

"South Africa has democracy," saidAU Commissioner for Human Rights, John Döhle.

"We celebrate the election results and look forward to working with the new government to promote democracy and human rights in South Africa."

The election results were also welcomed by the opposition parties, who said they would work with the ANC to bring about change in South Africa.

"We support the ANC's victory," said DA leader Hottent. "We will work with the ANC to bring about change in South Africa."

The ANC's victory has been welcomed by many South Africans, who hope it will bring about change in the country.

"We hope the ANC will bring about change," said Zuma. "We will work hard to make South Africa a better place.

We will work to make South Africa a better place.

Caribbean businesses emerge as a

In Black and White:
Alcoholic beverage advertisers target African-American community

By Reshida Eyed

There are good reasons to be nervous about the alcohol industry's marketing practices. As a nation, we have struggled with the consequences of alcohol abuse and addiction for generations, and yet, the industry continues to target vulnerable populations with its ads and promotions. In this article, we explore how alcoholic beverage advertisers are tailoring their marketing strategies to appeal to African-American consumers, and what this means for public health and social justice.

The Color of Advertisements

It's Wednesday night. You're in line at your local liquor store to buy a bottle of wine. As you wait, you notice that the ads on the walls and in the window are all focused on alcohol. Some feature images of people drinking and socializing, while others show bottles of beer and wine. This is a common scene at liquor stores across the country, but it's particularly prevalent in Black communities. The reasons for this are complex, and involve a combination of historical and contemporary factors.

The Misconception

Many people believe that Black communities have a lower incidence of alcohol-related problems than other groups. However, this is a misconception. In reality, Black communities have some of the highest rates of alcohol-related problems, including binge drinking, alcohol dependence, and alcohol-related deaths. This is due to a number of factors, including poverty, discrimination, and the legacy of slavery.

The Advertising Industry

The alcohol industry is aware of the vulnerability of Black communities to alcohol addiction, and they have made deliberate efforts to target these communities with their advertising. According to industry estimates, Black communities represent a significant market for alcoholic beverages, and advertisers have responded by increasing their investment in advertising to this demographic.

The Problem

This targeting of Black communities is problematic for a number of reasons. First, it is driven by a profit motive, and has little to do with public health concerns. Second, it reinforces stereotypes and marginalizes Black people, and fails to address the root causes of alcohol-related problems. Finally, it creates a self-fulfilling prophecy, as the more that alcohol is marketed to Black communities, the more likely it is that Black people will turn to alcohol as a coping mechanism.

The Solution

One potential solution is for the alcohol industry to conduct a public awareness campaign that promotes responsible drinking and healthier lifestyle choices. This could include funding research on effective prevention and treatment programs, and partnering with community organizations to deliver these programs. In addition, the industry could support policies that limit alcohol availability and marketing in vulnerable communities.

Conclusion

Alcoholic beverage advertisers target African-American communities to increase sales and profit. However, this targeting is problematic and reinforces stereotypes and marginalizes Black people. It is time for the industry to take responsibility for their actions and work towards creating a safer and healthier environment for all Americans.

"Life is a journey. I want people to really enjoy. I want them to be happy. I want to inspire. I want to make them feel good," said Jennifer Pickens, a senior at Howard University.

Pickens, a 22-year-old from Atlanta, is a visual artist who uses her art to express her emotions and share her experiences with others. She recently exhibited her work at the Howard University Art Gallery, where she showcased her paintings and drawings, each of which tells a unique story.

"I want my art to be relatable. I want people to connect with it, to see themselves in it," Pickens said. "I want my art to inspire others to believe in themselves and to work hard to achieve their dreams."
